Ombudsman probers: CJ wealth up to ₱677M

Corona to finally take witness stand on May 22

By TJ Burgonio

CHIEF JUSTICE Renato Corona may have accumulated a total of ₱677 million in unexplained wealth, including "more or less" $10 million, from 2001 to 2012, investigators of the Office of the Ombudsman said in a report.

Corona is scheduled to finally take the witness stand at his trial in the Senate impeachment court on May 22 to answer the allegations against him.

The panel of investigators, formed by Ombudsman Conchita Carpio Morales to look into complaints that Corona may have accumulated ill-gotten wealth, summed up their findings as follows:

- A net increase of ₱8,970,980 in Corona's net worth.
- A discrepancy of ₱38,770,878 in his bank deposits. [Deposits bigger than what's in his SALN]
- Dollar bank transactions of $10 million or ₱428 million from April 2003 to December 2011.

'Good governance' head draws Miriam's fiercest outburst yet

By Christian V. Esguerra and Cathy C. Yamsuan

WAS AN organization of some 1,000 members professing "good governance" used as part of a "well-planned and orchestrated effort" to discredit Chief Justice Renato Corona and remove him from office?

Defense lawyers yesterday called the impeachment court's attention to this possibility, considering the actions of Harvey Keh, lead convenor of the "good governance" group Kaya Natin!

In her fiercest outburst in the impeachment trial so far, Sen. Miriam Defensor-Santiago gave Keh a lengthy dressing down for acting on unverified information from an "anonymous" source.

Like the defense, Santiago said the documents could have been made up by anyone. She warned that Keh was "now in danger, in jeopardy of being charged criminally" for violating such laws as the Foreign Currency Deposits Act.

On Day 39 of Corona's impeachment trial, Keh admitted submitting to Senate President Juan Ponce Enrile a set of unverified documents on alleged

Orphans know 'kuya,' not 'Tebowing'

LAMBUGOD, Philippines—The last time Tim Tebow visited his father's orphanage here in the remote hills of Mindanao island, he stood at the edge of a grassy yard and told the children to make a hoop with their arms. Then, to their amazement, he threw a football right through them.

"He's really good at throwing!" said the Rev. Roberto P. Gaurao, 67, who runs the orphanage with his wife, Raymunda, 65. "At 30 meters, he could hit dead center, or even farther."

That was three years ago, before Tebow's professional stardom cut down on his time for travel to the Philippines. But the boys and girls here still toss around a football he left behind.

Pacquiao faces new foes: Gays, lesbians

By Bayani San Diego Jr.

WHO KNEW that Manny Pacquiao's toughest opponent wasn't Floyd Mayweather Jr. or Timothy Bradley, but the entire lesbian-gay-bisexual-transgender (LGBT) community?

As far as gay rights advocates are concerned, it's a knockout.

The consensus on the Net is that the Filipino boxing champion has fallen from grace because of his rant against gay marriage. It has also ignited an online petition for Nike to drop Pacquiao as endorser. An Internet report claimed Pacquiao is now barred from The Grove, a shopping mall in Los Angeles, where the TV show "Extra" is taped, because of his "bigotry."

From illegal fishing to seaweed farming

By Celso Evangelista
Puerto Princesa City

IT TOOK fisherman Angelino Rebinitoda at least two trips of cyanide fishing in the South China Sea to realize that what he had earned from this illegal activity was not worth the destruction it brought to the marine ecosystem.

A SEAWEED farmer harvests green seaweed off the shore of Pandan Island, in Palawan.

"I joined illegal fishing activities back in the 1990s," Rebinitoda, 56, of Barangay Tagburos in Puerto Princesa City, said in an interview with journalists in April.

He said he was with a group of Chinese fishermen who were into cyanide fishing in the South China Sea. "But after two or three trips, I realized it's not good for the environment," he said.

In 2005, through a project that sought to remedy the depletion and destruction of marine resources in the country, Rebinitoda discovered a more earth-friendly way to earn a living—cultivating seaweeds.

At present, Rebinitoda is the project manager of the Pandan Island Multi-Purpose Cooperative (PIMPC), one of the top producers of seaweed in Puerto Princesa.

Income diversification

Seaweed farming is one of the "income diversification" components of the Fisheries Resource Management Project (FRMP) in the Philippines funded in part by Asian Development Bank (ADB), with the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Fisheries and Aquatic Resources serving as executing and implementing agencies.

The project aims to lessen the coastal communities' reliance on fishing by promoting alternative—and more profitable—livelihoods. Aside from promoting seaweed farming, the FRMP has established protected areas such as fish sanctuaries, which checked coral destruction and enhanced marine life.

It also helps communities to venture into other small businesses, such as crab fattening, fish pen culture and piggeries.

Members of the PIMPC said cultivating seaweed was more profitable than fishing because of the big demand for this marine resource. Seaweed, a type of algae, is used in manufacturing a variety of food and nonfood products, including ice cream, noodles and vitamin capsules.

Rebinitoda said a kilo of dried seaweeds could earn P46 for seaweed farmers and P2 for the cooperative. One kilo of dried seaweeds is produced from 7 kilos of mature fresh seaweeds or 10 kilos of young fresh seaweeds.

Good harvest

According to Dolo Martinez of the fisheries sector of the city agriculture office, farmers can generate as much as 5 tons of dried seaweed in one planting activity. "That's already considered a good harvest," she said.

In February, the government's Philippine Information Agency reported Palawan was the top seaweed-producing province in the country with 577,185 metric tons in 2011, citing records from the Bureau of Agricultural Statistics.

Mario Molato, 59, PIMPC chair, said fishing was more difficult than growing seaweed. "When you fish, you're always tired because there's less time to sleep. You work from night until morning," he said.

Rebinitoda agreed, saying that in seaweed farming, "you manage your own time."

To cultivate seaweed, seedlings are tied with straw along a nylon rope or the "main line," which is about 15 dips or arm spreads, Rebinitoda said. The main line is set in the middle of the sea and anchored by ropes to the sea floor. Sealed empty plastic bottles are tied to the rope as floaters to buoy the main line.

If the weather is good, the seaweeds are harvested after 45 days, then dried for four days, he explained.

"All you need to do is maintenance work," Rebinitoda said, which means cleaning the seaweeds twice a week.

Good for environment

Both Rebinitoda and Molato expressed hope that more people would consider seaweed farming as their main livelihood because of its financial and environmental benefits. "We want to encourage more people to try seaweed farming," Molato said.

MARIO Molato, chair of the seaweed farmers cooperative

ANGELINO Rebinitoda, project manager of the seaweed farmers cooperative

Rebinitoda emphasized the importance of protecting the environment. He said illegal fishing practices, like the use of cyanide, has a devastating impact to the marine ecosystem, so people must do their part to protect it.

"We must educate people, especially our children, and make them aware [of these environmental issues]," Rebinitoda said. "If we protect the marine environment, we can help enrich our sources," he added.

According to the ADB, under the FRMP a total of 56 barangays in Puerto Princesa have benefited from the livelihood projects.

Fish sanctuaries

A total of 370 hectares of the city's marine area has been declared fish sanctuaries. "The first fish sanctuaries were in Barangays Binduyan and Manalo and were funded by ADB. These became our models when establishing other fish sanctuaries," Martinez said.

The two sanctuaries, the 74-hectare Manalo Fish Sanctuary and the 60-hectare Binduyan Islang Reef Fish Sanctuary were established in 2000 and 2002, according to the Coastal Conservation Education Foundation website.

"Through city ordinances, we have established 15 fish sanctuaries, and have proposed seven more," Martinez said.

Increased tourism activity in Palawan has also helped in the city's ongoing marine protection activities.

According to Martinez, the Pambato Fish Sanctuary on Pambato Reef has not only increased fish stock but has also become an income-generating project by becoming a snorkeling destination for tourists who want to see different kinds of marine life.

"It's the first fish sanctuary established as an ecotourism area," she said.

Strauss-Kahn sues maid, seeks $1M

NEW YORK—Disgraced ex-IMF chief Dominique Strauss-Kahn is seeking more than $1 million in a countersuit against the New York hotel maid whose accusation of sexual assault last year brought down his glittering political career.

The complaint, signed on Monday and made public on Tuesday, seeks a minimum of $1 million, plus legal costs and undetermined punitive damages from the maid, Nafissatou Diallo, who is accused of "falsely and maliciously asserting" she was attacked.

The 18-page document accuses Diallo of malicious prosecution, abuse of process, false imprisonment, defamation and intentional infliction of emotional distress.

"Ms Diallo participated in the commencement and maintenance of a baseless criminal prosecution," the suit said, "and in doing so intended to injure Mr Strauss-Kahn."

The suit was the French politician's latest attempt to turn the tables on Diallo and recover from a scandal that started a year ago when Diallo accused him of forcing her into oral sex when she went to clean his luxury hotel room.

An initial criminal case against Strauss-Kahn collapsed because Diallo lied to Manhattan prosecutors on certain aspects of the story.

However, Strauss-Kahn was forced to resign from the International Monetary Fund and abandon his hopes of winning the French presidency.

Subsequently, Diallo launched a civil suit seeking unspecified damages in New York, while in France prosecutors opened a separate criminal case against Strauss-Kahn, alleging involvement in a prostitution ring serving orgies in several countries.

The rival civil suits are both filed in New York state court in the Bronx, where a judge has ruled against Strauss-Kahn's bid to claim diplomatic immunity and force the maid's action thrown out.

They represent diametrically opposed versions of what happened when Diallo went to clean Strauss-Kahn's Manhattan Sofitel suite.

According to Diallo, she was assaulted by a nude Strauss-Kahn. Shortly after, she notified hotel staff, the police were called, and Strauss-Kahn was arrested at John F. Kennedy Airport just as he was about to fly to Europe.

In his suit, Strauss-Kahn says there was a sexual encounter, but "no violence, force or coercion" and "Ms. Diallo suffered no injuries whatsoever." He then presents a version of events that makes him the sole victim, starting with "a degrading and humiliating strip search" by police and being "paraded in front of international media in handcuffs as part of a 'perp walk' intended to humiliate him." The suit notes that Diallo was determined to have lied to prosecutors about her past, most damagingly about a supposed gang rape in her native Guinea, which in fact did not take place.

Strauss-Kahn blames the legal onslaught and publicity for "causing grievous harm to his personal and professional reputation" and "losing his position with the IMF." AFP

CCA MANILA student Maria Arendt Flores bags the silver medal, the highest in the Ethnic Asian Food category at the 15th WACS Congress in Daejeon, South Korea.

IT TOOK THEM only less than three weeks to create dishes that would win international awards and recognition for their culinary school and their country.

Interestingly it was how Philippine representative Maria Arendt Flores gave a modern twist to the traditional Vietnamese spring roll.

Flores, instead of using lettuce and aromatic leaves in the roll, mixed up the aromatic leaves of mint and basil into a thick pesto sauce and used it as dipping sauce for the spring rolls. She left the spring rolls unwrapped, but filled with pork, prawns, crab meat, wood ear mushrooms and vermicelli noodles.

Flores won silver for her Vietnamese spring roll and other dishes, CCA chef instructor [illegible] won bronze for his problem.

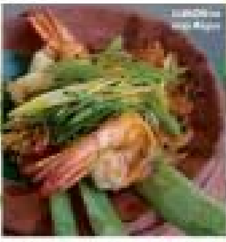

Both were in the display category at the 25th World Association of Chef Societies (WACS) World Congress held in Daejeon, South Korea, last May 1-5.

This global culinary competition, endorsed by WACS for the first time in Korea, drew chefs from all over to show off their skills and techniques.

SEEING DOUBLE
Not a few show biz observers have noticed the resemblance between singer Sarah Geronimo (bottom picture) and "American Idol" Top 3 finalist Jessica Sanchez. Sarah told the press that she's "honored" by the comparison with Jessica, who she thinks is "beautiful in her own way." Jessica herself says she admires Sarah and Charice Pempengco. Although she's unfamiliar with the language, Jessica sings Filipino songs. On her YouTube channel, Jessica can be seen performing "Sana," originally recorded by Sharon Cuneta.
